Based on the game Pachisi from 6th century India, ludo is now widely popularized and recognizable in the Western market as the premier race board game. It was officially licensed and issued under that name in England in 1896. Some of the more popular versions include Terry! and problems. Ludo is popular all over the world, especially in Europe. Some names in different countries are Mensch Argere dich nicht in Germany, Mens-erger-is-niet in the Netherlands, Parchis in Spain, Le Jeu de Dada or Petits Chevaux in France, Non t'arrabbiare in Italy, Fia between knuff in Sweden and Parqués in Colombia. Ludo can be enjoyed by all, young and elderly. The rules are not complicated, which makes it enjoyable and relaxing to play the game. Pay attention though, as one removed token can turn to tides games and heat up emotions! Be the first player to have all four of your colored pieces in the Finish area on the panel! The Ludo board is divided into 4 squares. These are usually color yellow, green, red and blue. Each player is assigned a color and has four chips in the same color. The board is usually square with a crossed-out play area, with each columns of squares, usually six per column. Middle columns usually have five squares of color; these represent the player's home column. The sixth color square, which is not on the home column, is the starting square of the player. At the center of the table is a large finishing square, often made up of colored triangles, where players must collect all 4 chips to finally finish the ludo game. The game starts when the player rolls the number 6 on the die. If a player doesn't already have chips in the game and squirms except 6, their turn turns to the next player. When a player has one or more chips in the game, he selects the token and moves it forward along the track the number of squares it indicates to die. Players must always move the token according to the value of die rolled. Permits are not allowed. If a move is not possible, the turn moves to the next player. Even if a player rolls six three times in a row, he misses the next turn. The Ludo board game allows each token to be moved 1 to 6 positions clockwise, according to the twisted number. Whenever a player lands on an opponent's token, they send the opponent's token back to their base. An exception to this rule is when a player lands in a special place with a shield symbol and his token is considered safe. Also, in our version of Ludo online, if a player happens to land on a site with a die symbol, they deserve an extra roll from die. Download VIP games for mobile devices.
